While segregation was tacitly acknowledged as a social fact by all concerned, it was not taken seriously as an explanatory factor in theorizing the perpetuation of urban poverty. In the ensuing years, Nancy and I elaborated, extended, and applied the concept of hypersegregation and ultimately deployed it a principal theoretical construct in our book American Apartheid ( Massey and Denton 1993 ).

Reflections on the Dimensions of Segregation

For this understanding, we must turn to the fifth and final theoretical approach to segregation—the institutional view—which is strongly linked to historical factors that have fostered racial discrimination in housing. Institutional explanations of segregation focus on the involuntary aspects of residential location and distribution. According to this view, involuntary segregation occurs because of institutional racism in the entire housing delivery system, including real estate ...
